Figuring from within: a study in history, painting and the work of Moses Tladi

YDA CORNELIA COETSEE

Supervisors: Dr Stella Viljoen & Prof Keith Dietrich

Thesis presented in fulfilment of the requirements for the degree of Master of Art
Stellenbosch University
Stellenbosch,
March 2015
Declaration

By submitting this thesis electronically, I declare that the entirety of the work contained therein is my own, original work, that I am the sole author thereof (save to the extent explicitly otherwise stated), that reproduction and publication thereof by Stellenbosch University will not infringe any third party rights and that I have not previously in its entirety or in part submitted it for obtaining any qualification.

March 2015
Part Two
Contents

ART PRACTICE

Aims .................................................. 1
City landscapes: An inner world ..................... 2
In the Garden ......................................... 9
Painting with the hands: Mark-making ............... 15
Nostalgia and the picturesque ......................... 16
A short trip to Sekhukhuneland ....................... 20
Suggestions for future work .......................... 21
Conclusion ........................................... 25
List of figures

1. Yda Coetsee, Wilderness series #1 ........................................... 3
2. Yda Coetsee, Wilderness series #2 ........................................... 5
3. Yda Coetsee, Wilderness series #3 ........................................... 6
5. Yda Coetsee, Wilderness series #5 ........................................... 8
6. Yda Coetsee, Savanna Scene ..................................................... 11
7. Ferdinand Hodler, Landschaft bei Château d’Oex .................. 12
8. Ferdinand Hodler, Forest brook at Leissingen ...................... 12
9. Yda Coetsee, Forest scene with two figures ......................... 13
10. Yda Coetsee, Forest silhouette at Bwindi ............................. 14
12. Yda Coetsee, Landscape - forest scene .................................. 18
15. Yda Coetsee, Landscape sketch - Sekhukhuneland ............... 20
17. Yda Coetsee, Landscape sketch - Sekhukhuneland ............... 21
18. Yda Coetsee, Limpopo landscape in the rain ....................... 22
Art Practice

AIMS

With this fine arts project I aim to recontextualise the basic premises of Romantic landscape painting in my South African and African context. I do this in order to explore how certain ‘Western’ art-historical designations function in this setting, and whether landscape can be an appropriate tool for critical art making despite its particular historic signification.

Intensified by my journey with Moses Tladi and informed by my prior knowledge of Romanticism, I ask whether it is necessarily the role of the artist to expose and explore the power relations embedded in certain geographical spaces, and whether landscape painting can not seek to transcend these realities. I suggest in this regard that depicting the landscape as serene and ‘non-political’ does not deny the politics of the exterior world, but that it draws attention to the inner reality of the individual, a political choice. The artist makes use of a metaphorical, spiritualised language to give transcendent characteristics to the elements of the physical world, a process which is highlighted by an emphasis on mark-making. Through spending time in certain geographic spaces, the artist explores the formal potential of the landscape, seeking to translate the visual impulses created by this physical world in an intuitive and meaningful way.

City landscapes: An inner world

I have worked primarily in landscape, and was surprised at the extent to which my practice changed during the time I was in Kampala (as exchange student for four months). Interiors was a subject I had rarely used before, and I did not initially see how this fit in with my project on landscape and Moses Tladi. In retrospect, however, these intimate works became symbolic for how figurative painting can represent a quest for transcendence from an outer reality, something I sense in Tladi’s work.

The city was an important theme in my Kampala experience, something which has a specific relation to both the Garden and the Wilderness. For me Kampala manifested primarily as the ‘locus of the market’, as Cosgrove describes the city (1998:44). Kampala is the hub of business in Uganda and hosts a population density of about 9429 people per square kilometer, excluding the many people who flood into the city by day and leave again at night. The traffic entering and leaving Kampala causes mass traffic standstills all around the city, and the huge number of pedestrians, motorcycles and bicycles on the roads make it difficult to travel by foot. In many other respects, Kampala is like a South African city.

For someone not used to the city, walking, a leisurely and stimulating activity, became a difficult and hazardous way to travel. This was part of why my focus changed from the outside world to an inner world, so that most of my moments of rest took place within doors, and more intimately, in my own imaginary world. The interior spaces I moved in became the main subject I engaged with in this time. After a few weeks with a local family,
Figure 1: Yda Coetsee, Wilderness Series #1 (2013). Acrylic and poster paint on box crate, 31.5 x 25cm. Artist's collection.
I moved into an apartment on the third floor of a residential compound, a small flat which I shared with two other students. I started painting in my room, something which became very much part of my daily life: Electricity and water failures in the building influenced progress, and the wire mesh covering my window (most windows are covered on account of mosquitoes) did not let in much light.

This series was painted on unassembled box crates, pieces of wood I acquired from a downtown industrial area with a local friend. Jonathan Mwesigwa, who studied art at Makerere and is now the pastor of a church in Gayaza, offered to take me by public transport to buy wood and paint, a welcome suggestion after a few failed attempts of my own. Kampala’s main industrial areas are primarily made up of small informal businesses, often selling secondhand goods. At a small shop called Nile Ply Woods, Jonathan bartered for a few pieces of elongated box crate sheets in Luganda, the language spoken in the central area. These pieces were hand-sawn into smaller parts, and we asked the carpenter to bend the rectangular aluminum fittings (seen in figures 5, 3 and 1) over to one side as they could not be removed without breaking the wood. Although I later primed the boards with PVA, they retained a lot of their original texture. In one work specifically (figure 2), deep indents run over the top half of the painting.

The medium used in this series became an important part of how the works developed. As oils would be difficult to transport and I did not have a studio, I opted for acrylic paints, which allowed for successive layering and painting. Because I had a limited number of boards, I had to recycle them for the remaining three months of my stay.

I started about ten paintings, using photographs of some of the significant or interesting spaces in my city experience. This included urban ‘gardens’, landscapes, two street scenes and images of the apartment. Of the ten works I started in this way, I finished only about seven and I chose to exhibit only four or five. The works all depicted specific interior spaces, for example the visual arts department, a bedroom, an office and an apartment interior.
Figure 2: Yda Coetsee, Wilderness Series #2 (2013). Acrylic and poster paint on box crate, 31.5 x 25cm. Artist’s collection.

In these work, painting became an obsessive act. The PVA was water-repellent and conflicted with the water-based acrylic and poster paints I used. This caused some colours to come off in strange patterns, seen for instance on the left hand side in figure 3. I applied paint with brushes, tissues and pieces of fabric and sometimes removed it with a nail file.
Figure 4: Yda Coetsee, Wilderness Series #3 (2013). Acrylic and poster paint on box crate, 31.5 x 25cm. Artist’s collection.
Figure 5: Yda Coetsee, Wilderness Series #4 (2013). Acrylic and poster paint on box crate, 31.5 x 25cm. Artist’s collection.
This was significant in that I felt very aware of the sensation of the painting surface. In areas where the painting became overworked, or where I wanted to remove certain elements, I re-applied the primer, masking out whole areas in white. In most cases, I covered figures or objects in the space, leaving the rooms nearly empty (such as in figure 5). Due to the successive layering and masking of paint, the original spaces - which started out as representation of actual locations - are now barely recognisable.

In retrospect, I believe this was a cathartic process, part of my dealing with the claustrophobia I felt in the city. The work slipped into a visual rhetoric bordering on the ‘kitsch’, because it sought out some form of the safe beautiful. The ‘domestic’ in these work (such as in figure 4) helped me familiarise myself with the alien circumstances, and in this way became a means of ‘home-making’.

For the exhibition, I keep the works unframed in order to draw attention to the coarse edges of the wood. I removed the small semi-circle fittings on either side with a clipper, as they were quite distracting, but painted over the rectangular fittings, which were bent over to one side. The works are shown as a visual whole and are placed at eye level, floating slightly from the wall.

In the Garden

The small framed paintings titled Garden series can be interpreted as Romantic, and at times picturesque, expressions of certain landscape memories. Whereas the majority of my time in Uganda was spent in the city, I was able to travel to some of the National Parks before returning home. Although my circumstances at home offered more freedom in terms of working space, I once again painted in the privacy of my bedroom, relying heavily on photographs. The paintings of these ‘hidden gardens’ has an almost confessional character, something which is echoed in the small scale of the work.

Part of the methodology of the Kampala works was repeated in this set, although to a lesser extent. In a work such as Savanna scene (figure 6), there is a feeling of paint being removed, rather than marks made intentionally. Some of the works are painted on recycled boards that I had primed and used for earlier work, and I casually allowed the earlier textures to show through the paint surface. Recycling and reusing became very much part of my life. In this work the ‘damaged’ surface seems to disrupt a landscape which is otherwise pleasant, luminous and in a way naive. The depth which is created by the impression of a distant horizon is unsettled by the confusing lack of perspective when seeing the work from nearby. As in some of the other works, there is a tension between opacity and translucency. The ghostlike figure in the sky in figure 6, for instance, is an accidental part of an older, recycled artwork.

Forest scene with two figures (figure 9) is less transparent than Savanna scene, and has a more conventional aerial perspective. A square format is used in both works, partly to denote structure and symmetry, but also because it echoes the work of Ferdinand Hodler and Gustav Klimt, both artists who have had an impact on my work. The flattened, pattern-like style of Hodler can be seen in landscapes such as Landschaft bei Château d’Oex (figure 7) and Forest brook at Leissingen (figure 8).

In its application of paint and use of colour Forest scene with two figures (figure 9) evokes the picturesque rather than the sublime; yet the Jeep track running through the rain forest could encode a set of environmental and political associations in Central and East Africa, one creating a certain tension. Although the work is small, it depicts the forest as large, unfamiliar yet awe-inspiring, shrouding the two figures beneath it.
Figure 6: Yda Coetsee, Savanna Scene (2014). Acrylic, gouache and oil on board, 15 x 15cm. Artist’s collection.

The presence of figures in this work is an exception. Like the artist David Caspar Friedrich’s Rübenfigur, figures in the landscape allow the viewer to place themselves in the narrative position, something which is implied in a work such as Forest silhouette at Bwindi (figure 10), where no figures are used. Figure 10 portrays an ‘insider’s view’, albeit an illusion.

In all of the parks we visited, it was obligatory to be accompanied by one or more park attendants carrying arms. This created a feeling of foreboding and haste, intensified by the emptiness and stillness of the park. As in Kampala, the phenomenology of walking was an important part of the visual experience. Due to the regulated walking of the park attendants, ‘walking’ in this context became a means to an end, somewhat distracting from the leisure usually associated with sightseeing.

In my surreal Kampala experience the expansive landscape outside became an unattain-Figure 9: Yda Coetsee, Forest scene with two figures (2014). Gouache on board, 15 x 15cm. Artist’s collection.
Figure 10: Yda Coetsee, Forest silhouette at Bwindi (2014). Gouache and acrylic on board, 22 x 16.5cm. Artist’s collection.
able sanctuary. The pristine natural environment of the National Parks, which in effect is Wilderness sanitized, evoked a sense of nature ‘before’ human habitation. In this way, it was both Wilderness in the traditional sense - nature uncultivated by humans - and a Garden of Eden, a place of sanctuary enclosed by the security of the National Park fence.

Painting with the hands: Mark-making

Cosgrove and Daniels believe that, “while landscape for the Romantic poets connoted an attractive, elevated, comprehensive, disengaged and orderly view of the world [...] so it was also distrusted (sometimes by the same poets) as a pernicious delusion, a dazzling trick designed to distort the world and its workings” (1988:7).

Since the Romantic era artists have been sceptical of the representational aspect of poetry and painting. In my own oeuvre there is a clear emphasis on mark-making. This is a direct result of the handling of the painting medium, but in effect draws attention to the painting surface and (albeit in retrospect) to the ‘failure of representation’. Shaw explains that in much of contemporary theory, “[t]he sublime experience points no longer to an object beyond reason and expression,” that is, the Divine, but rather to “that within representation which nonetheless exceeds the possibility of representation” (2006:4).

In Forest scene with two figures (figure 9), I alternate small, detailed elements (e.g. bottom right) with large, scratchy brushstrokes and blotches. In Landscape - forest scene (figure 12) the landscape subject is almost completely abstracted. The varied paint application and lack of aerial perspective creates a flattened, organic design, something echoed in Plantations near Mbarara (figure 11).

Cosgrove and others write extensively on the mythology around the Pastoral. This category of landscape painting, as explored in Tladi’s work, has its roots in classical and biblical imagery and captures the Arcadian relation between humankind and nature. The Pastoral also “expresses itself through modes of production, patterns of settlement, and folk culture that spring from the unceasing inhabitation of the same place or region” (Foster 2008:48).

Plantations near Mbarara (figure 11) is the most ‘cultivated’ of landscapes in the Garden series. The banana plantations and red soil is typical of the Ugandan setting, and specifically of the Mbarara area in the West where the original photograph was taken. Although the plantations mark the setting as something ‘domestic’, bright red and black areas in the work enhance the feeling of the tropical and even suggest the poisonous (bottom right, figure 11). The layered middle ground creates a feeling of abstracted design.

On the surface level Garden series signifies different degrees of human occupation and intervention in the landscape. Yet this aspect is shrouded almost entirely by the emphasis on the formal characteristics of different kinds of landscapes. In works such as Plantations near Mbarara (figure 11) the landscape is reduced to abstracted marks hinting at certain landscape elements, almost like Paul Cezanne’s Mont Sainte-Victoire works. Rhythm, texture, mark-making and improvisation have become the main subjects portrayed.

NOSTALGIA AND THE PICTURESQUE

In retrospect, the most picturesque of my works became dreamscapes and, in a way, surreal. The forest experience was conflated and confused with the many emotions and memories of the Uganda experience, and although the Garden works were more pleasant to create than the Wilderness series, they acquired a sad nostalgia. Pathway — Southern Uganda (figure 13) depicts a meandering road in an iridescent forest setting. Although no figures have been added, it is suggested by the path that the viewer is making his/her way from darkness into light, something which has a spiritual and psychological connotation appropriate for the melancholia I felt at the time. Apart from the title, little geographic clues are given to the location of the site.
Figure 11: Yda Coetsee, Plantations near Mbarara (2014). Gouache and acrylic on board, 19.2 x 19.2cm. Artist’s collection.
Figure 12: Yda Coetsee, Landscape - forest scene (2014). Gouache and acrylic on board, 19.2 x 19.2cm. Artist's collection.

In most of the work (such as figure 13 and figure 10), the nostalgic element is accentuated by the effect of the painting surface. All the painting in this series was done partly in gouache, a medium with a dry and matt surface texture. The effect of the gouache paint is a ‘dryer’ texture, lacking the immediacy of oil and somewhat resembling old print reproduc-
Someone remarked that the lack of patina in my work suggests a lack of ‘residue’, as if the paintings were painted in a different era but did not convey the historic contention of the garden idea and the colonial picturesque. My response in this regard is that focusing on the individual’s experience is a political choice, and the pastoral or Edenic world view is not bound to a certain art-historical context. I framed the works in simple, contemporary frames, which in my own view is an important tool to indicate the time and context in which the paintings are exhibited. The works were framed in Kiaat (Wild teak), a South African wood, and stayed unvarnished to compliment the mostly matt finish of the paintings.

A short trip to Sekhukhuneland

In March 2014 a friend familiar with the area took me to Limpopo in search of the kind of landscapes Tladi painted. We travelled by car, and during day excursions stopped in secluded spaces where I took time to do a sketch. Painting ‘in situ’ taught me a lot about the difference between studio and painting en plein air. When I painted figure 16 it was threatening to rain and clouds and shadows in the landscape changed continuously. In a work such as figure 14, the landscape had little picturesque appeal.

In the works I did in studio, like Limpopo landscape in the rain (figure 18), I repeated the Kampala methodology of addition and erasure, removing certain parts of the gouache paint with a wet piece of fabric. This allowed the white gesso ground to shine through luminously, adding to the transcendent feel of the landscape. This work speaks of human occupation, but intentionally portrays the landscape as peaceful and awe-inspiring. In this sense it echoes the pastoral viewpoint of Tladi’s work.

Suggestions for future work

The most recent works I did, figure 20 and figure 19, are improvisations on the landscape theme, but focus more specifically on the set of geographic locations encountered on the journey outside the city. In the final exhibition, I hope to include paintings of the rain-forests, a small set of caves near Fort Portal, the Savanna plains at Lake Mburo, and Murchi-
Figure 19: Yda Coetsee, Murchison Falls (2014). Acrylic and oil on box crate, 25 x 31.5cm. Artist’s collection.
Figure 20: Yda Coetsee, Forest stream at Bwindi (2014). Acrylic and oil on box crate, 25 x 31.5cm. Artist’s collection.
son Falls (or locally known as Kabalega), a waterfall gorge where the Victoria Nile reaches Lake Albert.

For Murchison Falls and Forest stream at Bwindi I recycled the box crates left from the exchange, and used oil, a choice partly inspired by seeing Tladi’s oil paintings in life. Like Constable’s cloud sketches, I perceive these works as mere impressions, painting what Honour calls a vision of the world “rendered in nervously frail lines” (1979:17). Compared to similar subjects by the artist Thomas Baines, I emphasize the process of mark-making, allowing for much of the primer and acrylic base layer to be seen beneath the oil. In all of the landscapes I suggest there is a surface-level representation in which there are traces of both the Garden and the Wilderness series; in figure 19, for instance, small indications of human intervention is visible, like the remnants of a bridge and a signpost for tourists. On closer inspection, however, both elements become enmeshed and reveal themselves only as painted marks on a flat surface.

Conclusion

Whereas my discussion of Tladi’s oeuvre explores all the works available — therefore provides a rich source for analysis — I do not include all my own sketches, experimental works or those paintings which were in my own view less successful. I this way the discussion of our work is very different. Nonetheless, both our practices suggest that the landscape genre could function as a dynamic and purposeful expression of self, influenced by — but not dependent on — socio-political context. In this regard the work is ‘about the self’, artmaking seen through a Romantic lens. Hugh Honour writes (1979:17) that for the Romantics, meticulously detailed, delicately precise drawings and paintings could [...] present an unmistakably personal, sometimes almost myopically close-sighted, vision of the world – a hypersensitive response to the exquisite uniqueness of natural forms, rendered in nervously frail lines.

Informed by a pastoral world view, the artist seeks refuge in the Garden (the safe and familiar) and the Wilderness (the sublime). This escapism combines the landscape as imaginative, and the landscape ‘perceived through the feet’, as Tim Ingold suggests (2004).

A revisionist perspective allows me a deeper awareness of the ways in which the imaginative and phenomenological could function in my work, and therefore how my work can be appropriately framed and curated. I conceptualise my exhibition as different conversations between the Garden and the Wilderness, the inside and outside. I dismantle and re-use these terms, suggesting that the city, for instance, could denote the Wilderness and the National Park the Garden. In order to demonstrate how my practice integrates with the research I have done, I include reproductions of Tladi’s work in my exhibition.

Using an exhibition that on first appearance looks conventional (the same way in which Tladi’s landscapes seem conventional), I challenge the viewers’ way of seeing. By means of written research and formal devices in my work, I draw attention to landscape not as a external representation of a physical reality, but as a complex interpretation and mediation of visual and emotional stimuli, by the representation of which the artist seeks to transcend his/her own fraught reality.
References

